Living Our Language: Ojibwe Tales and Oral Histories (Native Voices)

Whatever it be, whether art or nature, that imprints in us the condition of living by reference to others, it does us much more harm than good; we deprive ourselves of our own utilities, to accommodate appearances to the common opinion: we care not so much what our being is, as to us and in reality, as what it is to the public observation. Rather than being subsidized by advertising, it aimed to provide content on an array of topics that was so useful that consumers would pay for it.
